Why Support a Local Food System?

Economy: Buying and selling local food re-circulates money within the community, thereby benefiting all community businesses and members. When farmers are able to sell their product directly, their farm businesses can be more profitable. Profit margins for farmers through conventional distribution channels are usually slim. The presence of a direct market for local farm products makes farming more viable and supports the local farm economy.

Environment: Local food trade generates far less pollution and utilizes far fewer resources than non-local food distribution. Studies have shown that the average distance that food travels from farm to plate in North America is 1,500 miles. Of the fossil fuels that are used in the world's food system, only 10% goes into actual food production, and the remaining 90% goes towards the packaging, transporting and marketing. Buying and selling food locally helps to reduce reliance on fossil fuels and supports a more sustainable food system. In addition, the presence of viable local farm businesses contributes to the preservation of farmland in the region.

Culture: A connected and working local food system helps to foster a sense of community. It helps to preserve the rural flavour and landscape that makes the Caledon-Headwaters area so special. Local food trade connects local farmers and businesses, providing a story and giving more meaning behind food that is sold and served.

Advice for Culinary Buyers

Advantages of Buying Local Food

Keep up with the local food trend. More and more, consumers are searching out local food. Your business will have a market advantage by purchasing and serving food from local farms. Be sure to promote your use of local food (e.g. farm names on the menu).

Opportunity for fresher ingredients. When you purchase local ingredients, they were likely harvested within the past day or two and are therefore fresher, more nutritious and flavourful. Local food also contains fewer additives because it does not need to withstand long travel times. It will make a difference in the food you serve!

Environmental and social responsibility. Supporting a local food system enhances the sustainability of your culinary business. Both you and your customers will feel good about that!

Food with a story. Purchasing local food for your business will connect you with local farmers and give a story behind the food you serve, providing a more meaningful dining experience for your customers.

Tips of the Trade

Commitment. Buy consistently from a core group of farmers so that they know what to expect, or communicate with your producer that you may be making purchases once in a while.

Delivery. Establish a delivery schedule with your local farmer.

Buying. Expect to pay a fair price and consider that a local farmer's cost may be more than the commercial shipped-in product. Don't expect the farmer to be selling at a discount. Establish a predictable routine with your farmer for phone calls, orders and questions. Communicate what works for you.

Education. Continue to learn about the items your farmer grows. Inspire your co-workers and employees to do the same. Items coming directly from a farm may look different from commercial items that your employees are used to seeing, and they need to know how best to take advantage of that difference

Talk to your farmer. Talk to them about what you plan to do with their product and what it will be paired with. Ask your farmer how they use it. If you are unhappy with something, let them know and why. It is in their interest to make you happy. Talk to your farmer about trends and request varieties you are interested in.

Cultivate trust. There is always a degree of uncertainty regarding crop size and quality. Remain flexible and patient with your farmer.

Be flexible. Use what is fresh and in season. Generalize your menus and produce departments. If certain products are fresh that day, they can be incorporated into a dish without changing the menu. Take advantage of daily specials.

Advice for Producers

Advantages of Selling Your Food to Local Businesses

Cross-promotion. When local restaurants or retailers are selling food from your farm, their customers will learn about your farm and your products. Think of it as free advertising!

Expand your market. Selling to local food businesses expands and diversifies your direct-sale market. Other culinary buyers and retail customers will learn of your farm, and will be more likely to drop in and purchase your products themselves.

Environmental and Social Responsibility. Supporting a local food system enhances the sustainability of your farm business.

Tips of the Trade

1. Commitment. Restaurants and retailers need to be somewhat automated in their purchasing patterns. When a business commits to buying a certain amount, they anticipate it to be delivered accordingly.

2. Delivery Schedule. Try to establish a delivery system that works for both of your schedules. Know your buyer's busy times and plan your calls and visits around these times, not in the middle of them.

3. Sell what you can deliver. If you are selling meats or fish, make sure that you have the appropriate permits to sell to restaurants or retailers. If you can't realistically fill an order, say so right away. If the product quality or quantity is different from what you offered, call and ask if they still want it.

4. Be Professional. Remember to be consistent in your work and with your product. Be easily reachable (e.g. answering machine, cell phone, email). Always deliver the freshest and best quality that you can. Assist the person receiving the delivery by collecting your boxes, be on time, courteous and prepare invoices ahead. Call if you will be late. Arrange payment terms.

5. Specialize and diversify. Diversify the product that you offer and make yourself unique. Research the market so you know what others are growing and where the holes are. Talk to your buyer about what they would like to see on their menus and shelves in the future.
